Henry is expert at making the complex simple and using this skill to advocate for clients.

It's why he chose to be a labor and employment attorney with an additional focus on immigration law. He deftly navigates shifting laws and regulations, and thoughtfully distills them into understandable information that enables his clients to take right action.

He developed this ability prior to law school when he worked for several years in regulatory compliance for a Fortune 500 financial institution. This provided invaluable perspective on the challenges that in-house counsel face daily, which he keeps top of mind as he advises his clients on everything from the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) to noncompete agreements to immigration law and beyond. It's experience that enables him to interpret law in a way that makes it workable for clients, enabling them to take the optimal path forward.

When he is not practicing law, you will likely find him playing bass guitar with his band.
